Region

The data in this report relate to people's place of usual residence, not place of employment. The high concentration of doctors in particular regions of capital cities tells us little about the actual workers' distribution in those cities; it merely demonstrates that doctors prefer to live in certain suburbs. This issue also affects data for remote areas: staff of the Royal Flying Doctor Service may reside in a large rural centre but their 'workplace' encompasses remote areas. Other publications in the Labour Force series provide more accurate data regarding workplace distribution.
